One effective solution is for parents to take children to the countryside. In areas overflowing with greenery, they can connect with and appreciate the beauty of nature. They might also have a chance to see wildlife that cannot be seen in their city. Moreover, there should be more opportunities for children to develop their knowledge about environmental issues in school. In a biology class for example, field trips to zoos or wildlife centres provide children with the opportunity to touch or see a wide variety of species and learn about conservation efforts that such institutions focus on.

Q3.

I believe holding the Olympics can stimulate the national economy. During the event, millions of visitors both from home and abroad come to the host city as well as to its surrounding tourist attractions. The increase in tourist numbers can fuel the demand for associated goods and services, including accommodation, restaurants and shops, which boost the sales and creates more employment. These positive changes will likely lead to significant economic development both nationally and locally.
